

ATHLETIC TRAINING

Students who make good athletic trainers are kinesthetic learners; they learn best through hands-on experiences. Athletic trainers enjoy sports, have interests in science, medicine and health, often have clinical experiences at night games or weekends, and must be good communicators.

side by side

- Chris Hamlyn '07 served as a lab assistant for Dr. Mark Huntington, followed by research and a presentation to the Dean's Symposium. His resume looked so good that Indiana University's graduate program director awarded Chris an assistantship.
- If Holly Smith '07 had the chance, she'd do her summer internship over again. She traveled with Athletes in Action, a Christian women's basketball team, to Sao Paulo, Brazil, and loved it!

academics that matter

Manchester's athletic training program is accredited and well respected in the region. You'll be side by side with certified athletic trainers in the field or on the courts as early as your sophomore year.

Because MC pays attention to attire, professionalism and work ethic, when it comes time for internships, job hunting or graduate school applications, you'll get noticed. Our athletic training majors often go to professional meetings to keep up with trends and to network with others. No wonder MC's placement rate is 100 percent for employment or acceptance to grad school for those who pass the athletic training certification examination.

success

- Claire Olson, ATC '07, just completed her master's degree at Ohio University and has accepted a staff athletic trainer position at Franklin College in Indiana.
- Extensive hands-on clinical experience was the key to Jim Forbes '07 being accepted to the Canadian Memorial Chiropractic College in Toronto.

I FOUND

... THE PERFECT FIT

When your core classes are small, around 10 or less, you get to know everyone. From the white elephant Christmas parties, to end-of-year cookouts, to movies at Doc's house, to bus rides with the team, I found so much—great friends and memories to last a lifetime. I went in as a scared, homesick freshman and I left graduating with honors, a certified athletic trainer and a successful woman.
