academics that matter

Manchester College faculty stay on top of what's in and what's out, what's required and what's new. Due to changes by Indiana's Division of Professional Standards, guidance counselors and media specialists no longer need to be licensed as teachers. The new educational studies major at Manchester is in place, opening doors to a wide variety of career options for students who want to work with children or youth but who don't want to be teachers.

side by side

- James Vincent got a summer job working with boys with emotional disabilities in a camp in New York state. The experience fit his passion and helped land James a job teaching autistic children.

- Nathan Grotrian '08 wanted to work with children who had emotional difficulties. But he didn't want to teach in the classroom. He arranged with his professor to take more psychology classes and to do an internship in place of the student teaching. It was a great experience and it fit his passion. He's currently working on his master's degree in school counseling.

SUCCESS

- Rob Dymond '07 spent January session in a special problems class researching how a new major in educational studies could be formed, what career opportunities might be available for those who didn't want teacher certification. Rob is now a lead teacher for young children in a day camp outside Ann Arbor, Mich.
- Amanda Mawhorter '05 always wanted to be a librarian. She chose an education major because it best suited her goals. Amanda went straight from Manchester to graduate school to become a media specialist.

I FOUND

... MY FUTURE.

I always knew that I wanted to work with kids, but I wasn't sure how. Manchester gave me a plethora of opportunities to find out. First it was special education, then elementary education, and now school counseling. Looking back, I've come a long way. After a lot of hard work and guidance from my professors, I've gained so much. Manchester helped mold me into the person I want and strive to be. I'm so thankful.
