

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

Maybe you've always known you wanted to be a teacher. Or perhaps you're just starting to think about it. Either way, Manchester is a great place to be qualified to teach all ages, including pre-school, kindergarten and grades 1-6. You don't have to choose. It's all in one degree. Plus, you get experience in the public school classrooms your first year—and in every education class you take. That's what sets Manchester apart. By the time you student teach as a senior, you'll be confident and comfortable that teaching is for you.

academics that matter

The Manchester education faculty are experienced teachers themselves, having worked with infants through the college level. They're passionate about learning, and they love teaching. Manchester has an excellent reputation in the region and turns out great teachers year after year. For those who are interested, Manchester also offers a two-year associate degree in early childhood education.

side by side

- Manchester education majors are inquisitive, and they aren't afraid to step up for a cause. Jenny Mevis '08 e-mailed Indiana's Senator Evan Bayh about a concern she had regarding "No Child Left Behind." Becca Flanders '07 worked part of a summer in a school in Ghana, Africa, while Erin Bowers '07 took advantage of an inner city student teaching experience and lived at the Chicago Center.

- Sarah Kaufman '07, Alice Bennet '07 and Katelin Harvey '07 got rave reviews when they were the only college students among other college professionals presenting at a Ball State workshop for educators and day care providers.

SUCCESS

- Manchester's Student Education Association (SEA) has a strong presence in the state association; they've been named Indiana's outstanding chapter three years in a row.
- Stacey Carmichael '07 studied a semester in Japan, traveled to Kenya, Africa, on a fellowship, and still graduated on time. To top it off, she won the prestigious Fulbright scholarship and is teaching a year in Korea.

I FOUND

... HAPPINESS

Everyone treats you with so much respect, and they are friendly here too. Whether you are in the community or on campus, people talk to you and ask how things are going. I have professors who care, friends who are loyal, teammates who never stop trying, and coaches who are determined. Who wouldn't be happy with that!?
