

GENDER STUDIES

Make a compilation CD of different feminist music. Analyze gendered language within the automotive industry. Stitch a family quilt to represent members in your family. Or find out why Muslim women wear the Hejab. Manchester College offers classes that study gender studies issues—forms of oppression, economic inequality, race/gender/class bias, and social change and policy—for the study of analyzing culture and society.

side by side

- Professors often bring scholars to campus to share ideas and research on gender issues. Students get the chance to meet the authors and presenters during class and over lunch at the College Union.
- Working together with Professors Ings and Oke, students in the gender studies class deconstructed books and literally transformed existing ones into works of art, exploring issues of gender through color and language.

academics that matter

- Manchester College offers a minor in gender studies, and students find great academic connections when they combine it with another major. Students interested in business-related careers, law, human resources, social work, psychology and peace studies, to name a few, would especially benefit from these classes. It was a perfect choice for Katie McCann '08, who aspires to be a college professor teaching women's history.

SUCCESS

- Maggie Miller '06 lives in Goshen, Ind., and works at ADEC, an organization that provides resources to those who are struggling to become financially independent.
- Kirby Jasper '06 works as a document prep specialist in an Indianapolis law firm.
- Heather Barto '03 combined her gender studies minor with English and teaches at RJ Reynolds High School in Winston Salem, N.C.

I FOUND

... INDEPENDENCE

lives. I saw the hope that people have no matter their circumstances. I saw the resilience of women and the love that people are willing to share with one another when they have common goals.

Kelsey Swanson '06, sociology major
