

HISTORY

Studying history at Manchester can be very exciting. Instead of just memorizing facts, our students experience the past. They travel to New York City, Europe and Africa. Or take a class on immigration and cook old family recipes, or sign up for a favorite professor's class simply because they enjoy that teacher's style.

academics that matter

The fact is, history majors make good employees. Students learn valuable skills that transfer to any career. Writing well, thinking analytically, doing research, organizing presentations, speaking in public ... all contribute to successful careers, some of which include teaching, public administration, public history, research or law.

side by side

- Marissa Buckles '06 worked closely with her professor on her honors project, studying how graveyards in the Midwest began and evolved.
- Jen Stewart '08 came as a first-year student thinking she had her whole life planned. She quickly realized that what she thought she wanted wasn't for her. She always loved history so with the help of her professor, she became a history major and added a religion minor.

- The competitive and popular Student Research Symposium is held on campus each spring. Students who choose to research and present papers work quite closely with their professors and get experience most don't get until graduate school. For Sam Cox '07, it was worth all the effort - he won first place!
- Karen Ames '09 is working with the College's public relations director gathering research about Martin Luther King's 1968 speech and visit to Manchester's campus.

SUCCESS

- Ashley Lichtenbarger '07 is interning for a program in medical history and pursuing a master's degree at IUPUI.
- Marissa Buckles '06 is working with Brethren Volunteer Service.

I FOUND

... A PLACE TO GROW

me into a lifelong learner and person of compassion. The community at Manchester is just so amazing!

Ashely Lichtenbarger '07, history and French majors
