

MUSIC

Write your own musical composition. Sing in New York's Carnegie Hall. Join others on a choir trip to Italy. At Manchester, students who are passionate about music live out their passions.

academics that matter

In larger schools, graduate students get the roles in operas and the chance to perform original compositions. At Manchester, everyone has the same opportunity. Jeff Combs, as a first-year student, wrote a piece and performed it at a recital.

side by side

- Associate Professor Debra Lynn took Katie McCann '08 with her to the state music competition on a recruiting trip. The whole driving time to Indianapolis and back, they talked. And they found so many similarities. "Family wise, the way she was raised, the way I was," Katie said. "We kind of decided we were like sisters separated at birth or something."

- Brittany Cook '08 never expected to play in the backup orchestra for an Amy Grant concert. But she did when the Manchester Symphony Orchestra performed with Grant at the Honeywell Center in nearby Wabash, Ind.
- Due in part to his music studies and participation at Manchester, James Hutchings '06 received a teaching assistantship and rave reviews from graduate faculty at the University of Missouri.

- Sarah Reed '06 majored in music and Spanish at Manchester, and still took all the prerequisites in science necessary for her acceptance into medical school at the University of Washington.
- Combining her music performance specialty with a minor in business, Audrey Lucker '07 is studying arts management in graduate school.

I FOUND

... POSSIBILITIES

After high school I figured I would have to focus my studies and performances on exactly what I wanted to do. But instead, when I came to Manchester, I saw that it would be a mistake to limit yourself. Thanks to the support of the faculty and staff, I've had the opportunity to be a singer, a historian, a composer, a friend, a director, a teacher, a conductor, a Pirate, and so much more. I no longer have to limit myself but rather I see my possibilities are endless.
