

PEACE STUDIES

Students who enjoy studying peace and justice issues are often good writers, who listen carefully, read much, consider options, and are passionate and committed to their values. Peace studies at Manchester means studying alternative nonviolent methods to conflict transformation—whether in personal lives or within international relations.

academics that matter

The oldest peace studies program in the world began here at Manchester College in 1948. Manchester offers a peace studies major, minor, and three concentrations within the major:

1. Interpersonal and intergroup conflict studies
 2. Religious and philosophical bases, and
 3. International and global studies.
- Peace studies majors can also design an individualized concentration within the major.

side by side

- Sarah Hall '08 worked with her mentor and professor in preparation for the Student Symposium. Sarah took the Jo Young Switzer Award for Excellence for her paper, which was also published in the Peace Studies Bulletin.

- Felix Lohitai '08, a Sudanese refugee, organized a panel discussion with refugees from Darfur as part of a 2008 week-long focus on the genocide in Darfur. On the panel, he joined internationally-known human rights activist and author John Prendergast, along with MC's vice president and dean for academic affairs Dr. Glenn Sharfman.

SUCCESS

- Debbie Thompson '07 completed a year of service with Americorps in San Jose, Calif., working with an organization called Our City Forest. Debbie coordinated volunteers who planted and pruned trees on school grounds and in neighborhoods.
- Mary Cox '09 visited Japan and met with survivors of the atomic blasts. Her trip was funded by World Friendship Center and her work inspired more research on nuclear issues which she plans to present at the next Student Symposium.

I FOUND

... THE WORLD

Having spent a total of 10 months living and studying in Mexico, I took twelve classes, learned Spanish, went on several trips, ate dozens of hot dogs and tacos, made lots of new friends and had thousands of new experiences—all while living in another culture and country.
