

PHILOSOPHY

Is the difference between morally right and wrong just a matter of opinion? Are there limits to human knowledge? If you wonder why things are as they are, or why people believe as they do, then you will enjoy studying philosophy.

side by side

- With the help of her professor and a Plowshares grant, Marilyn Reish '07 developed an independent study class for a January trip to North Korea, where she traversed the mountains and caught a glimpse of the rich history of the people.
- Students interested in lively discussions meet each Monday night for Kenapocomoco Coalition at Professor Ken Brown's house, a block from campus. Students munch on homemade bread or popcorn, and drink coffee or tea as guest speakers challenge students to think through controversial issues.

academics that matter

Studying philosophy provides a solid foundation for many careers and an excellent preparation for many graduate programs, including medicine and law.

You'll study logic and how to analyze and evaluate arguments. You'll discover new perspectives on the nature of truth and the nature of reality, on citizenship, on being human—and with this, you'll gain a much clearer understanding and grounding of your own beliefs.

SUCCESS

- Shane Ring '05 finished a master's degree in philosophy at Purdue University and will continue his studies toward a Ph.D.
- Boris Nikolaev '05 majored in philosophy and economics at Manchester and is in the doctoral program in economics at the University of South Florida.
- Mitch Herniak '04 is in law school at IUPUI; Brett Vanlandingham '04 is studying law at IU/Bloomington.
- Graduating from Manchester with majors in both religion and philosophy, Abby James '04 finished a master's degree in museum studies and is now studying toward a Master of Public Affairs degree at IUPUI.

I FOUND

... MY PASSION

I found my real passion was not in psychology as I previously thought, but in philosophy; and in the ability to understand the questions that science cannot answer, and the answers that confound us because they seem illogical.

Stephen Schellenberg '09, philosophy major
