

POLITICAL SCIENCE

Follow the news. Debate with your friends. Travel to Washington D.C. and to Africa. Study politics because you care about the decisions governments make and about how those decisions affect people's lives.

academics that matter

Political science students not only learn about government and politics, they also learn basic skills that transfer to any career. Writing well, thinking analytically, doing research, making presentations, speaking in public ... all contribute to successful careers, some which may include law, government service, public administration, policy research or teaching.

side by side

- Jenny Schoenle '09, Andrew Doub '11, Jason Ray '11, Ellen Zemlin '09 and Tyler Yeager '09, were among students who, along with their professor, saw first hand the work and frenzy of the Iowa Presidential Caucus during January.
- Ben Martin '08 took his volunteer efforts from Iowa to the South Carolina caucus.

- Model U.N. teams go to the Harvard National Model each year where students gain valuable skills in diplomacy, communication and conflict resolution. Manchester College is the only college in the U.S. to hold permanent observer status with the United Nations, as a non-governmental organization.

SUCCESS

- Farida Adam '08, Toani Rasaki '08, and Nkechi Onyeji '08 all had internships during January of their senior year. Nkechi's led to a job offer where she coordinates a program affiliated with Harvard Medical School providing help to Uganda underprivileged women.
- Wendy Matheny '06, who interned with Senator Hillary Clinton's office, worked for a high profile law firm in Washington D.C., and won a prestigious Fulbright scholarship to study in Belgium, is now working for the Feminist Majority Foundation.

I FOUND

... EXCITEMENT

As a Manchester student, I had the opportunity to participate in state legislative lobby day. It was a great experience. Not only did we get to meet our representatives from our hometowns, we also were able to see lawmaking first hand. My representative introduced me to every passerby we saw. It was also exciting to be there and to think of the places where a career in public service might lead me.
