

RELIGION

Students who have a curiosity about the meaning of life, who enjoy reasoning, or who like researching difficult texts such as the Bible, will enjoy the study of religion. Some students study religion in order to be more actively involved in their own church communities or to prepare for a career in law.

academics that matter

Manchester encourages religion majors to study abroad and has structured the major so that students can easily include a semester in another country. Cheltenham, England, for example, has an excellent religion department where classes can be taken and transferred to MC. Or, through Brethren Colleges Abroad, you can choose to travel and study in a variety of other popular locations, including Greece, France, Spain, Germany, Ecuador, Japan or Mexico.

side by side

- Joe Hoover '07 majored in biology-chemistry and picked up a minor in religion. He had the opportunity to work side by side with doctors, dentists and other professionals in a medical practicum three-week class in Nicaragua during January.

- Jennifer Stewart '08 came to Manchester thinking she had her life all planned out. But that changed after she took her first history class and decided to change her major. She worked closely with her professor, adding a religion minor to her studies.

SUCCESS

- Travis Poling '06, a religion major with an English minor, wrote a literary paper from a religious perspective for the Dean's Symposium his senior year. He was accepted after graduation to Bethany Theological Seminary.
- Levi Hauptert '07 doubled up his interests and majored in both chemistry and religion. Although his primary interest was chemistry, Levi chose to add the religion major because he felt it helped diversify his thinking skills. He's now in graduate school at Purdue, working on his Ph.D. in analytical chemistry.

I FOUND

... NEW GOALS

I transferred to Manchester from another college and I've found everything I wanted from a college. Religion minor, history major, and I'm playing on the men's golf team. I feel right at home, literally. Manchester is a great place to meet new people and have a bunch of friends.

Andy Burton '09, history major
