

UNDECIDED

You want to go to college but you haven't decided on a major. That's OK. The advisor you meet when you first come to campus will help put your mind at ease. Besides, you don't have to officially decide a major until the end of your sophomore year. In the meantime, check out the opportunities Manchester offers.

explore and discover

Take a class that interests you. Talk to other students. Find a professor whose teaching style matches how you best learn.

- Jen Stewart '08 thought she had her whole life planned out. But when she took her first history class with Dr. Mark Angelos, she found herself engaged in discussions and in love with the material. No problem. She changed her major and will still graduate on time.

Even if you think you know what you want to study, keep your options open. Manchester likely offers majors you've never even heard about, or even knew you might like. Explore. Immerse yourself in something new. A recent study indicates that from age 18-40, people hold an average of 10.5 different jobs. The trend is that people will change careers too, multiple times. That's all the more reason why it's good to study a variety of subjects.

finding success

Did you know that many jobs and graduate programs don't require a specific major? Of course, you need to take specific classes in the sciences to be admitted to medical school, but you can major in anything. Law school is similar. The key is, become a good writer, communicate effectively, and think critically about controversial issues. No matter what your major, the skills that you most need for success are developed in the classes you'll take at Manchester.

- Sarah Reed '06 majored in music and Spanish at Manchester. She also took lots of classes that interested her, specifically in chemistry, biology and foreign language. More than one medical school accepted her, but she chose to study at the University of Washington.
- Accounting major Ashley Davis '07 is studying corporate law at DePaul University College of Law in Chicago. Laurie Gribshaw '06, exercise science and athletic training major, found she was solidly prepared for the University of Indianapolis's physical therapy school.

I FOUND

... CHOICES

I love the opportunities. Whether you take a class, join a club, or simply talk to someone, this campus never forces you to be something you aren't. There are so many things to be a part of, so many things to learn, and just the right amount of people to trust and know a little something about each one. MC is a place to explore and truly discover who you are.
